I actually like Adobe's new Lightroom-compatible iPad app, as it aggregates all your Lightroom and Photoshop content. It's targeted at someone who wants to use a single device for all image-editing purposes. Now, personally, I use a laptop for all Lightroom-related editing tasks, and I work on my desktop computer for Photoshop. Cutting-edge designers, such as they are, do the same. However, it's good to see that Adobe is finally in the groove and is offering more features for photographers across multiple platforms. I can see how an Android or iPhone/iPad app would make sense. "Scrapbooking" is such a broad and important purpose. Photographers will undoubtedly find it useful. Thank goodness for advanced Photoshop and Lightroom users, by the way. Due to the popularity of these programs among photographers, total beginners will have trouble. At the same time, the ease-of-use often works in its favor, even if Advanced users will feel less than comfortable. Artistic differences aside, Lightroom in particular is damned simple to use. It doesn't always require a lot of knowledge or experience to create a 'finished' image. Instead, the program is simple to pick up and use, and it's easy to get going without feeling like you are going to be lost in a jungle. On the other hand, if you're seeing an image for the first time and want to know how to fix certain things, you're probably not going to find the answer. Adobe doesn't go out of its way to guide the user. The result is a program that is easy to use, but not really intuitive on a conscious level. I really would like to see a few more guides for Photoshop, even if I would have to pay for them. In my opinion, Lightroom is just as intuitive as the other programs it's based on.
